GAO discussed the Office of Management and Budgets (OMB) reviews, pursuant to paperwork reduction legislation, of agencies requests to collect information. GAO noted that OMB: (1) annually received between 3, 000 to 4, 000 agency information collection requests; (2) implemented regulations for submitting information collection requests and developed a formal review and notification process, but typically relied on informal review practices; (3) did not systematically check for duplicative information collection efforts; (4) provided generally inexperienced reviewers with little training in judging a requests technical merits; (5) approved 95 percent of requests, and formally modified between 8 percent to 12 percent and informally modified other requests; (6) most frequently cited failure to demonstrate the practical utility of or need for the information collection effort on disapproved requests; (7) rarely approved certain agencies requests, and was less likely to approve new submissions or research-oriented requests; (8) timely completed most of the reviews, although the median time for reviews increased; and (9) disapproved 4 technically adequate and approved 7 technically inadequate requests out of 17 that GAO reviewed. GAO also found that agencies reported: (1) that OMB regulations and guidelines heavily influenced their information gathering decisions; (2) that they perceived positive, negative, and neutral effects of the OMB review process on information availability; and (3) using some strategies to circumvent the OMB review process.
